Palliative care is an area of healthcare which draws on concepts and theories of information exchange in human communication. As a result, many of the tools and techniques used in palliative care are designed to assist the carer in communicating information to, and thereby supporting, the person with a life-limiting illness. This paper presents a conceptual model of the carer-person relationship at the end of life. It suggests that the model is an essential part of an information exchange system for a range of reasons, but particularly as a way of providing a conceptual model with which to understand the inherent complexity of the carer-person relationship.On the first Monday of each month, the Flux team meet for an all-day "unconference" at the Walsby Hotel. It's a great excuse to have a bunch of beer and conversation with your friends and colleagues and get a feel for the Flux team's thinking, and the Flux community's thinking, on the direction the company is heading in. We've hosted four such unconferences, and we're doing them again in May. For May we've got a guest speaker who I want to mention who is our tech lead, Amanda. Amanda is a cognitive scientist, cognitive roboticist, and human-computer interaction researcher. She works in the context of embodied, situated and embodied 82157476af
